

Canadian Bass Fishing Lures Many Tourists

Bass fishing has always been one of the most popular and challenging sports for anglers. The bass family, which includes (but is certainly not limited to) the striped, largemouth, smallmouth, spotted, black, and white species, helps anglers kick off every fishing season. While many anglers try year after year for the elusive "whopper" to display on the wall, smallmouth bass and other smaller varieties can be most fun to catch, as they don't give up without a helluva fight. Without question, bass fishing is big business, yielding a multi-million dollar industry. There are specialized fishing rods, reels, countless lures and even boats designed specifically for bass fishing.

Canada is home to some of the world's most excellent fishing grounds. The bass fishing season opens in March and ends late in July. In addition to seeking bass, many anglers head for places like Vancouver Island to fish for Feeder Chinooks, Ucelet, Halibut, and King Salmon. The variety of fish found within Canada's borders help to preserve it as a popular destination for sport fisherman. While Canada's fishing and tourism industry has opened the doors to countless adventurous travelers, the same fame has led to a problem in protecting Canada's precious natural resources.
